Kwajalein Missile Range re-established as command

By Jim Bennett

Kwajalein Missile Range has a new head with a new title in Lt. Col. Raymond Jones.

Jones assumed command of the missile range in an official ceremony Friday marking his new leadership of the organization, and the re-establishment of the range as a command.

"Today's event is indicative of the importance and the confidence the Space and Missile Defense Command, the Army, and our nation places on the range," said Col. Gary K. McMillen, USAKA/KMR commander.

Jones added, "During the past three weeks that I have been on the islands, I have met nothing but consummate professionals dedicated and focused on the mission. To the person, I have seen nothing but the intense desire to meet the challenge and represent USAKA/KMR in the highest traditions of our service and our nation."

The assumption of command means the head of the range is now a command-designated position, McMillen said. Those picked must have a relevant background in air defense, space or program acquisitions, for example, and be chosen by a command selection board through a rigorous process.

According to 1st Sgt. Ozell Robertson, only 10 percent of battalion command level officers, O-5 or higher, gain a command in a given year. That represents on average 50 of 500 officers a year.

"There's more screening now going into who we get out here," McMillen said. "But besides the selection process, nothing really changes."

McMillen retains command of the base and facilities here at USAKA/KMR and oversight of the range, as well as his duties as representative of the U.S. commander-in-chief, Pacific Area, to the Republic of the Marshall Islands and Republic of Kiribati.

Enniburr mission work dedicated

By Carol Sword

In spite of a little rain, nothing could dampen the spirits of Enniburr (Third Island) residents and visitors as they came together to celebrate the completion of a beneficial project.

Project Bailey Manta Ray II, whose primary mission was the refurbishment of the school and clinic on Enniburr, was dedicated in a ceremony Wednesday on Enniburr.

Among the attendees was Col. James Dries, deputy chief of staff for engineering in the Pacific, Audie Kabua, representing Leroij Neimata Kabua, the island's traditional ruler, Billy Bolong, representing the RMI national government, and Dick Lupton, acting site manager for Raytheon.

The project was completed by the 505th Engineer Battalion of the North Carolina National Guard as part of their annual summer training.

Range becomes a command . . .

Meanwhile, Jones will be responsible for all test programs.

The shift in designations comes at a busy time for the range, which is currently working on at least four major missions over the next two months.

"We'll be full-steam the next few weeks," Jones said. "It speaks well of the level of experience out here, that we can have that kind of schedule."

Jones' most recent experience includes duties as chief of flight test for fixed wing and special projects at the Aviation Technical Test Center, Fort Rucker, Ala. Prior to that, he was chief of flight test for cargo/utility helicopters.

"I'm a tester," Jones said. "I've been a tester most of my career. And testing is the same whether it is aircraft or missiles. You run into the same kinds of problems and questions."

A 1983 West Point graduate, Jones is also an experimental test pilot, having served in a number of different aviation postings and qualified in eight different rotary and fixed-wing aircraft, with experience in 39 aircraft.

Jones brings not only his experience to Kwajalein, but also his family, including wife, Nancy; son, Sam, 5; and daughter, Nona-Marie, 3.

"We're thrilled to be here," Jones said. "I can't say enough about our welcome."

When he's not at the range, Jones, a certified diver, likely will be found under the surface of nearby waters. He's also expressed an interest in the annual Rustman triathlon, which may tie back to his mission, the range schedule, and new command.

"This is the way to start my tour," he said. "We hit the ground running."

Jeramon non kom

"Jeramon non kom" is the Marshallese way to say, "Goodbye and good luck friends."

George and Mary Knittel are leaving Kwaj Aug. 6, after a three-year second tour. He was a system engineer for MIT. They are going to Lexington, Mass., where he will work at MIT Lincoln Lab.

They say, "We have given all that we were able to give, received all that we were able to receive, and leave with no regrets except that our time here was so short."

Quick-thinking boaters answer distress call

By Jim Bennett

An incident that could have had tragic consequences turned into an example of quick-thinking last week, when boaters and small boat marina workers reacted to a spear fishing accident.

According to Trea Carmichael, small boat marina manager, a spear fisherman was taking two TDY visitors out oceanside off SAR Pass, when he accidentally slashed his arm, rendering him unable to drive the boat back to the marina.

Tino Salvador, who was fishing off B-boat 62, near the West Reef, heard the distress call on the radio, stopped fishing and went to help.

"He (Salvador) did everything right," Carmichael said.

Salvador took the injured man in boat 62 back to the marina where an ambulance was standing by.

The man was given stitches and later released.

Meanwhile, marina worker Lamona Thomas took another marina boat out and directed incoming boat traffic to a single pier, leaving the second pier open for the incoming boat 62.

"And this was our busy time," Carmichael said. "So we had a lot of boats coming in."

Thomas next drove out SAR Pass to where Boat 79 remained, and escorted the TDY visitors through the sometimes treacherous pass.

Said Carmichael, "This is a good example of how boaters should help one another."

USAKA/KMR and Enniburr dedicate National Guard construction work . . .

After inspecting the new facilities, Col. Gary K. McMillen, USAKA/KMR commander, emphasized the impact of the school on the community.

"You are looking at tomorrow's leaders," McMillen said. "Many of the people that work for USAKA will come from your classrooms."

McMillen praised the soldiers for completing their work ahead of schedule so that refurbishment could also be done on the police station and water catchment building. He also acknowledged the teamwork of Steve Johnson, RSE project manager; Jim Landgraff, USAKA/KMR engineer; and Lt. Col. Steve Beal, USAKA/KMR foreign area officer. Landgraff assisted in logistical support for the soldiers, while Johnson did much of the planning and ordering of materials, and then provided technical oversight and day-to-day support. Beal was responsible for getting the project approved and funded, as well as ensuring successful completion of the mission.

McMillen presented Army Commendation medals to 1st Lt. Joseph Hough and 1st Sgt. George Crosswhite of the duration staff for their work, dedication and leadership. Both men are members of the 505th Engineer Battalion of the North Carolina National Guard, which was charged with the duty of completing the refurbishing job. McMillen also awarded commander's coins to Laijen Attadi from the WIP shop on Kwaj and Bill Garner from the FOM shop on Roi-Namur for their support of the project.

Hough and Crosswhite presented a school bell with an inscription to the principal and Enniburr representative, Ina Lomae. 505th Command

Sgt. Maj. Steen Richards brought the bell to the atoll when he and Lt. Col. Roy Adams, battalion commander, visited the soldiers last week.

"Before the renovation, there was very little light inside the school, and water leakage destroyed many of our books," Lomae said. "Now we have nice windows to provide better light, and the structural renovations have made the building safer. All of these things will help the students learn better."

"Providing an education is a priority of our government," added Jeban Riklon, acting mayor of Kwajalein Atoll. "This kind of assistance is a symbol of the cooperation between our two nations."

The preparatory work for the project was done by Marshallese workers provided through assistance of the Kwajalein Atoll Local Government and the Kwajalein Atoll Development Authority. This work included site cleanup and pouring the cement slab for the clinic addition. Enniburr residents also provided volunteer labor.

New furniture, including a medical exam table, is en route for both the school and clinic. Dwight Stevenson, Roi safety engineer, donated first-aid medical supplies to the clinic. One of the major improvements to the building is the addition of a nurses' quarters so that a health care professional can live at the clinic and provide full-time care.

Safety and security have also been enhanced, thanks to the new roof on the police station.

"We're very appreciative of the job that the National Guard has done," said police Lt. Julius Lejjena. "It has really helped the community. The leaks from the old roof did a lot of damage to our police radios and paperwork."

The 505th sent three rotations of 28 members each. They deployed at two-week intervals between June 12 and July 24. A fourth rotation of eight members arrived July 19 and departed July 31.

1st Lt. Cristopher Gilbert led the third rotation 'B' company detachment, which came from Forest City and Kings Mountain, N.C.

"This is one of our best annual trainings due to the satisfaction of the job and the friendly atmosphere of the island residents," Gilbert said.

"We enjoy doing projects that benefit other people," Sgt. 1st Class Mike Lowery added.

Crosswhite, who was present throughout the project, said he will always remember his time here.

Said Crosswhite, "In my 22 years of military service, I have never visited a country where I was met with such open arms. The hospitality and friendship given to me by the Marshallese residents will last a lifetime."
